INTRODUCTION

An unfairly vulnerable community

Many Hispanics work in the leisure, hospitality and service industries. The community believes the pandemic will be a major threat to their personal finance. Two in three employed Hispanics would not get paid if the virus caused them to miss work for two weeks or more.

Although they are as worried as the General Market, Hispanic families have one more thing to be concerned about: who will look after their family if they can't.

Fighting racism and inequality

Many vulnerable, low-income workers do not have the privilege of staying home and instead opt to put their health on the line for fear of suffering from wage loss or being laid off by their employers.

COVID-19 is spreading rapidly around the world, but the world needs to be fed. My dad out in the Central Valley Orange fields early this Sunday AM I, as well as many other farmworkers who can't afford not to work. Thank a farmworker. #theyfeedus #protectfarmworkers #coronavirus

Canta y no llores

Sing and don't cry. Humor is a fantastic tool for resilience. Hispanics turn to humor in uncertain situations. In a way, it is a response to a sense of hopelessness.

TikTok is booming with Hispanics sharing how their culture reacts to COVID-19.

Livestreamed concerts are organized to encourage people to stay home.

Memes are shared, constantly.

"...I am making tacos for those families who lost their jobs. Take care..."

Hispanics are "opening up their kitchens" to make sure their community isn't hungry and their basic needs are met.

Hispanics united to take action

Hispanics are disproportionately affected by the negative impact of COVID-19, both at the heath and economic levels. In this time of crisis, we need to recognize that we cannot overcome this alone.

Hispanics represent a fundamental part of the American community and they're often not seen, heard or valued. They are 100% Hispanic and simultaneously 100% American.

Thank you.
